* The area and population of the several States of Africa are, in most cases, merely approximations; exact data being impossible to procure, owing to the barbarous nature of the inhabitants and their governments. In fact, we are less acquainted with the geography and people of Africa than with the same in any other portion of the world.

† The population of the Republic of Liberia, exclusive of the aboriginals, is only about 4,500.

MOUNTAINS OF THE WORLD.

Mountains are the most conspicuous and the most durable features of the land; they are the immediate offspring of the globe, and owe their origin less to surface action than any other of its features. They are generally composed of rocks of some description or other, of which there are three classes, which show that they have been produced by different causes. The first are those which have been produced by deeply-seated action, without any access to the atmosphere, or other agent of combustion or melting. They may be termed subterranean rocks; and, so far as observation has gone, they range from granite upwards to the older porphyry, or to the more indurated species of the slaty or stratified rocks.

Secondly, there are those which appear to have undergone a greater or less degree of the action of combustion, which begin with porphyry and end with the more recent lavas which have been ejected from volcanoes. They may be termed igneous rocks, for though they have not, of course, been produced by fire, they show marks of its action.

Thirdly, there are stratified rocks, including, among others, the limestones, some of which are of crystalline texture, showing that they have been subjected to strong heat, under very great pressure. The whole of this third division may be regarded as consisting of debris, produced and accumulated by surface action; the limestones, generally speaking, and also some of the others, having been formed in the ocean.

Besides their varied composition, and the grandeur which they add to the landscape, mountains are exceedingly useful in the grand economy of terrestrial nature. If they rise to lofty elevations, and have their escarpments steep and precipitous, they are not in themselves fertile; but they are the causes of fertility in the surrounding lands. They conduce to this effect in various ways, by generally abounding in springs, and pouring down living streams of water in all directions; the overflowing of these streams fertilizes the soil of the places which their waters flood; and the mountains elaborate out of the atmosphere a constant supply of water for them.

In most of the continents, and many of the islands, there are mountain summits which rise above the limit of the snow, and rise the higher the nearer they are to the equator. The snow melts to a certain extent, during the dry and warm season of the year, and thus gives out annually a highly beneficial supply of water. In high latitudes, where the elevation of the snow-line is less, and the melting of the snow produced more quickly, destructive floods often result, and carry everything before them; but, in all the more favorable places of the earth, the effect is generally the reverse.

Mountains are thus most interesting subjects for study, independently of those useful materials with which they abound, and which are most easily worked or obtained in mountain districts. The hills are the bones of a country, and determine its form just as the bones of an animal do; for, according to the direction of the hills must be the course of the rivers. If the hills come near the sea, the rivers are short, and their course very rapid; if they are a long way from the sea, the rivers are long and comparatively gentle. But rivers of the latter sort are generally navigable, and become large enough, near the sea, to be capable of receiving ships of great size. Here, then, cities will be built, and these will become rich and populous, and so will acquire popular importance. On the nature of the hills depend the mineral riches of a country; if they are composed of granite or slate, they may contain gold, silver, tin, and copper; if they are composed of limestone, they are very likely to have lead-mines; if of sand or gritstone, it is probable that there will be coal at no very great distance. On the contrary, if they are made up of the yellow limestone, or of chalk, or of clay, it is quite certain that they will contain neither coal, nor lead, nor any valuable mineral whatsoever. But on the mineral wealth of a country, and particularly on its having coal or not, depends the nature of the employment of its inhabitants, if they are in a civilized state.

Thus, then, on the direction and composition of the hills of a country depends, first of all, the size and character of its rivers. On the character of its rivers depend the situation and importance of its towns, and its greater or less facilities for internal communication and foreign trade. And again, on the composition of the hills depends the employment of the people, their number in a given space, and in a great degree the state of morals, intelligence, and political independence.

High as many of the mountains of the globe appear to be, when contrasting their height with any well-known object, they are insignificant in comparison with its general mass. Sir John Herschell compared the inequalities on the earth's surface to the roughness of the rind of an orange, the highest mountain being about five miles in perpendicular elevation, would be only 1–1000th part of the earth's diameter, consequently, on a globe sixteen inches in diameter, such a mountain would be represented by a protuberance of not more than the 1-100th part of an inch. Now as there is no entire continent, nor even any very extensive tract of land known, whose general elevation above the sea is anything like half this quantity, it follows that if we could construct a correct model of our earth, with its seas, continents, and mountains, on a globe sixteen inches in diameter, the whole of the land, with the exception of a few prominent points and ridges, must be comprised on it within the thickness of thin writing paper, and the highest hill would be represented by the smallest visible grain of sand.

Baron Humboldt has shown, by the closest calculation, that the entire range of the lofty Alps, which cover an area of 45,000 square miles, would, if reduced to powder, and spread over the continent of Europe, only raise its general surface twenty-one and a half feet; and that the Pyrenees, which divide France from Spain, would only have the effect of raising the same continent six feet; while the central table-land of Spain, the greatest height of which is only 1920 feet, would, if applied to the same purpose, raise the general land of Europe to the altitude of seventy-six feet.

The mean height of Europe has been determined to be 671 feet above the level of the sea; Asia, 1154 feet; and the united continent of America, 949 feet. South America, separated from the northern portion, maintains a general elevation of 1151 feet—about the same as that of Asia.

* Elbrouz and Kasbeck, the two greatest elevations of the Caucasian range, are frequently placed among the mountains of Asia. This range is the dividing line between Europe and Asia in the south. Elbrouz and Kasbeck being on the north side of the Caucasian range, we have considered them as more properly belonging to the European quarter of the world. Mont Blanc, which has heretofore been considered the highest point in Europe, is, if our position be correct, superseded by Mt. Elbrouz, which is 1919 feet higher.

* This mountain, so far as our present knowledge goes, may be regarded as the highest on the globe; Dhawalaghiri, formerly considered the highest, is now found to be a little over 100 feet lower, according to actual measurement. A new determination of the Dhawalaghiri, however, it is said, gives this mountain the first rank among all snow-capped mountains of the Himalaya range.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND ITS GREAT TRIBUTARIES.

The MISSISSIPPI RIVER, with its chief tributary, the Missouri, forms not only the longest, but one of the most important rivers in the world. It is (including all its tributary streams,) entirely within the boundaries of the United States.

This great river was discovered as early as 1672, yet its true source was not fully determined until its exploration by Mr. Schoolcraft, in 1832; it was then found to take its rise in the small lake Itasca, which is situated in 47° 10′ N. Lat., and 94° 54′ W. Long. from Greenwich.

This lake forms a beautiful sheet of transparent water, about eight miles in length; its shape is irregular, and it is situated among hills covered with pine forests, and fed by springs. It is 3160 miles from the Gulf of Mexico, and elevated about 1680 feet above the ocean.

This river drains an extent of territory which, for fertility and vastness, is unequalled upon the globe. The territory, termed the "Mississippi valley," extends from the sources of the Mississippi in the north, to the Gulf of Mexico in the south, and from the Alleghany Mountains on the east, to the Rocky Mountains on the west. Or, to give its outline more definitely, we will take a position on the Gulf of Mexico, where it empties its accumulated waters, and run a line northwestward to the Rocky Mountains, from whence issue the sources of the Arkansas, Platte, and other smaller streams; from this point, along the Rocky Mountains, to the sources of the Yellowstone and Missouri Rivers; around the northern sources of the latter river to the head-waters of Red River, a branch of the Assiniboine; around the sources of the Mississippi proper, to the head-waters of the Wisconsin and Illinois Rivers; between the confluents of the lakes, and those of the Ohio, to the extreme source of the Alleghany River; along the dividing-line between the sources of streams flowing into the Ohio River, and those flowing towards the Atlantic; between the confluents of the Tennessee, and those streams emptying into Mobile Bay; between the sources discharged into the Mississippi, and those into the Tombigbee and Pearl Rivers; to the mouth of the Mississippi, and from its mouth to the outlet of the Atchafalaya. The whole presenting an outline of more than 6,000 miles, or an area of about 1,237,311 square miles, divided as follows:—

	Sq. miles.
Valley of the Missouri	510,000
" " Lower Mississippi	330,000
" " Ohio	210,000
" " Upper Mississippi	187,210
Total,	1,237,311

The Mississippi River is navigable for steamboats, with but partial interruption, as far north as the Falls of St. Anthony, a distance of 2037 miles, and, at seasons, as far as Sauk Rapids, about 100 miles farther; its course, however, is extremely crooked, and not unfrequently a bend occurs from 20 to 30 miles round, where the distance across is not more than a mile or two. In some instances, however, these distances have been shortened, by what is termed "cut-offs," which are made by opening a narrow channel across the neck of a bend, when, on admitting the water, the current, running with such velocity, soon forms a channel both wide and deep enough for the largest steamboats to go through. The navigation is frequently rendered dangerous, owing to the mighty volume of water washing away from some projecting point large masses of earth, with its huge trees, which are carried down the stream. Others, again, are often imbedded in the mud, with their tops rising above the water, and not unusually causing the destruction of many a fine craft. These are called, in the phrase of the country, "snags" and "sawyers." The whirls, or eddies, caused by the striking peculiarities of the river in the uniformity of its meanders, are termed "points" and "bends," which have the precision, in many instances, as though they had been struck by the sweep of a compass. These are so regular, that the flat-boatmen frequently calculate distances by them: instead of the number of miles, they estimate their progress by the number of bends they have passed.

A short distance from its source, the Mississippi becomes a tolerable-sized stream; below the Falls of St. Anthony, it is half a mile wide, and below the Des Moines Rapids it assumes a medial width and character to the mouth of the Missouri. About fifteen miles below the mouth of the St. Croix River, the Mississippi expands into a beautiful sheet of water, called Lake Pepin, which is twenty-four miles long, and from two to four miles broad. The islands, which are numerous, and many of them large, have, during the summer season, an aspect of great beauty, possessing a grandeur of vegetation which contributes much to the magnificence of the river. The numerous sand-bars are the resort, during the season, of innumerable swans, geese, and water-fowl. The Upper Mississippi is a beautiful river, more so than the Ohio: its current is more gentle, its water clearer, and it is a third wider. In general, it is a mile wide, yet for some distance before commingling its waters with the Missouri it has a much greater width. At the junction of the two streams it is a mile and a half wide. The united stream, flowing from thence to the mouth of the Ohio, has an average width of little more than three-quarters of a mile. On its uniting with the Missouri, it loses its distinctive character: it is no longer the gentle, placid stream, with smooth shores and clean sand-bars, but has a furious and boiling current, a turbid and dangerous mass of waters, with jagged and dilapidated shores. Its character of calm magnificence, that so delighted the eye above, is seen no more.

The Mississippi River differs in peculiarity of character from that of any other river upon the globe; its entire course being directly from north to south, consequently it embraces a great variety of climates and productions, which it otherwise could not do, if its course was in an opposite direction.

One would naturally suppose, from the extent of country drained by this river, that the spring floods would be very great; but it must be remembered that, the course of the river being from north to south, and, as the return of the warm season advances in a contrary direction, its icy fetters are gradually removed, the surplus waters, therefore, being allowed time to pass off through its natural channel into the Gulf of Mexico. During times of great freshets, however, the banks are frequently washed away, thereby causing great destruction of life and property. This is termed a crevasse.

The lower part of Louisiana has been formed by deposits from the sea, and, lying very low, is at all times subject to inundation.

For a distance of three hundred miles along the river bank, the country back from the stream is, in many places, lower than high-water mark; and, for a distance of 130 miles or more, an artificial bank or mound, called a levee, has been constructed, to confine the river to its natural channel. This embankment is composed of clay or green turf, strengthened with cypress logs, and varies from 5 to 15 feet in height, and from 10 to 30 feet in width. When the river is full, the prospect of rich fields, teeming with luxuriant crops, and studded with villas and villages full of life and animation, lying below the level of the river, is a novel, and, to the stranger, a startling sight.

Below the mouth of the Ohio the islands in the Mississippi have all been numbered; but at present the numbers are very irregular, owing to the circumstance of many being washed away by the force of the moving waters, and new ones continually forming.

This "growing up" of the islands of the Mississippi, is one of the most striking characteristics of this mighty river, and one that would not present itself to the eye of a voyager passing along the stream, unless the islands that were growing up were pointed out, and the philosophy of the phenomenon explained to him, which is as follows:—"Where the current strikes diagonally off from a point above the head of an island, the eddying waters produce a sand-bar under the point at the mouth of the 'chute,' or channel round the island. Upon this bar collects the alluvial soil of the river, from which spring the young cottonwoods, which, being of very rapid growth, soon shoot up into tall trees, and completely shut out the channel from the view of the river. The 'chutes' behind the islands then form lakes. Upon the waters of these lakes congregate all kinds of aquatic fowl — swans, geese, ducks, pelicans, and the like."

South of the thirty-third degree of latitude may be seen the first view of the Spanish Moss, hanging in gloomy grandeur from the boughs of the cypress trees. Here, also, is the Palmetto, with its broad, fan-like leaf, the lofty cottonwood, the sea-grass, the impenetrable cane-brake, and all the concomitants of a southern forest. Alligators are also not unfrequently seen, reposing upon a log, and basking in the noonday sun, in descending the Mississippi from about this latitude.

The MISSOURI RIVER enters the Mississippi a little below Lat. 39° north. Owing to its carrying a greater volume of water than the latter river, and besides imparting its own general character to it, some writers have thought its name should have been given the stream from its junction to the Gulf of Mexico.

This, the greatest tributary of the Mississippi River, rises in the Rocky Mountains, a short distance from the head-waters of the Columbia, and nearly in the same parallel of latitude as the Mississippi River. It is formed by three streams, which unite not far from the base of the principal range of the mountains; these are denominated Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin, and are in 45° 10′ N. Lat., and 110° W. Long. After this union, the river continues a considerable distance to be still a foaming mountain-torrent; it then spreads into a broad, and comparatively gentle stream, with numerous islands. The river then becomes almost a continued cataract for about 17 miles, during which its perpendicular descent is about 362 feet. Its course continues rapid for some distance farther.

The YELLOWSTONE, one of the principal tributaries of the Missouri, rises in the same range of mountains with the main stream. It enters from the south by a mouth 850 yards wide, and is a broad and deep river, having a course of about 1600 miles. The PLATTE, another of its great tributaries, rises in the same range of mountains with the parent stream, and, measured by its meanders, is supposed to have a course of about 2000 miles before it joins that river. At its mouth it is nearly a mile wide, but is very shallow, and is not boatable except at its highest floods. The KANSAS is a very large tributary, having a course of about 1200 miles, and is boatable for most of the distance. The OSAGE is a large and important branch of the Missouri; it is boatable for 660 miles, and interlocks with the waters of the Arkansas. The GASCONADE, boatable for 66 miles, is important from having on its banks extensive pine forests, from which the great supply of plank and timber of that kind is brought to St. Louis.

Above the River Platte, the open and prairie character of the country begins to develop, extending quite into the banks of the river, and stretching from it indefinitely, in naked grass plains, where the traveller may wander for days without seeing either wood or water. Beyond the "Council Bluffs," which are situated about 600 miles up the Missouri, commences a country of great interest and grandeur, denominated the Upper Missouri. It is composed of vast and almost boundless grass plains, through which run the Platte, the Yellowstone, and the other rivers of this ocean of grass. Buffaloes, elk, antelopes, and mountain sheep abound. Lewis and Clark, and other respectable travellers, relate having found here large and singular petrifactions, both animal and vegetable. On the top of a hill they found the petrified skeleton of a huge fish, 45 feet in length. The herds of the gregarious animals, particularly the buffalo, are innumerable. Such is the general character of the country until we approach the spurs of the Rocky Mountains.

The OHIO RIVER enters the Mississippi at about 37° of N. Latitude. It is formed by the junction of the Alleghany and Monongahela, the former being navigable for keel-boats as far as Olean, in the State of New York, a distance of about 250 miles; the latter is navigable for steamboats to Brownsville, 60 miles, and by keel-boats upwards of 175 miles. At Pittsburg commences the Ohio, and, after running a course of about 1000 miles, unites its waters with those of the Mississippi. No other river of the same length has such a uniform, smooth, and placid current. Its average width is about 2400 feet, and the descent, in its whole course, is about 400 feet. At Pittsburg it is elevated about 1150 feet above the ocean. It has no fall, except a rocky rapid of 22½ feet descent at Louisville, around which is a canal 2½ miles long, with locks sufficiently capacious to admit large steamboats, though not of the largest class. During half the year this river has a depth of water allowing of navigation by steamboats of the first class through its whole course. It is, however, subject to extreme elevations and depressions. The average range between high and low water is probably 50 feet. Its lowest stage is in September, and its highest in March. It has been known to rise 12 feet in a night. Various estimates have been made of the rapidity of its current, but, owing to its continually varying, it would be difficult to assign any very exact estimate. It has been found, however, according to the different stages of the water, to vary between one and three miles: in its lowest, however, which is in the autumn, a floating substance would probably not advance a mile an hour.

Between Pittsburg and its mouth it is diversified by many considerable islands, some of which are of exquisite beauty, besides a number of tow-heads and sand-bars, which in low stages of the water greatly impede the navigation. The passages between some of the islands and the sand-bars at their head, are among the difficulties of the navigation of the Ohio.

ARKANSAS RIVER enters the Mississippi on its west side, south of Lat. 34°, after flowing a course of about 2000 miles; it is one of the largest tributaries of that mighty stream. It rises in the Rocky Mountains, from which it pours a broad and deep stream upon the arid and sandy plains below. The sand and the dry surrounding atmosphere absorb the water to such a degree, that, in any season, it may be forded many hundreds of miles below the mountains. Some of its tributaries are so impregnated with salt, as to render even the waters of the main stream unpotable. The alluvial earth along the banks contains so much salt, that cattle are said sometimes to be killed by eating it. To the distance of about 400 miles from its mouth it has many lakes and bayous. In the spring floods steamboats can ascend it nearly to the mountains.

The RED RIVER, which joins the Mississippi in about 31° N. Lat., is one of its principal western tributaries. It takes its rise in New Mexico, near Santa Fé, and flows a course of about 1500 miles, during which it receives a number of other streams that water an extensive region of country. Much of the land is of great fertility; and cotton, the sugar-cane, corn, tobacco, and many other useful productions can be raised upon it. Perhaps the greatest drawback to the early settlement of this noble river, is the existence of a vast obstruction to the navigation, called the Raft, which extends a distance of about 70 miles along the river. This great obstruction was, in a measure, removed by order of the Federal Government, during the years 1834–5; but, owing to the enormous deposits of this river, another has since been formed, the lower portion of the raft extending to within thirty miles of Shreveport, La. During periods of high water, boats of light draught are enabled to avoid the raft by passing through the channels formed during these times. This raft consists of an immense mass of timber and fallen trees, brought down from the upper sources of the river, and which found a lodgment here. It causes a great expansion of the river, to the width of about twenty-five miles, which spreads at the raft into a number of narrow channels. Weeds and small trees have taken root upon the surface of this timber, and grow above the waters. Above the raft the river is broad and deep, and is navigable for steamboats, at seasons, for 1000 miles; keel-boats, however, can usually pass over it.
